INDIFFERENT VOTERS.

We consider it the duty of every man to appear on the day of election and deposite his vote for such rulers as it may be necessary to elect. In fact, every man is bound by every consideration which can attach him to a free government to exercise this political privilege. Some men say, my vote is not worth any thing-parties have become corrupt-I will have nothing to do with them; and so on. But do such persons sufficiently consider the consequences of, such a course. We apprehend they do not; for the consequence, most assuredly, is, to transfer power into the hands of the weak or corrupt. Let no man therefore on any occasion, say his vote is worthless; or that he feels indifferent in relation to the individuals on whom political power may be bestowed. A man, virtuously inclined, may see many things in the party to which he belongs, which he detests. He may, and often does, see errors of the grossest character. But, as these are things to which all human associations ere subject—things. feels indifferent in relation to the individuals on whom expected as the earth is expected to turn on its own axis, the call to act is still more loud, and the more gion are promoted only by those who are ready to practice self-denial on all occasions; and who are ever desirous of urging forward those institutions which have such attributes in view. Shall we abandon honesty, truth, integrity, kindness, because certain members of the community cheat, lie, deceive and malign? Or shall we forsake the worship of our Maker because some have abandoned the path of religious duty?-These questions need only be asked in order to be answered. Now if these things can only be promoted by the zealous, persevering efforts of the good, how can any other object be successfully carried forward without their aid? We have no right to sit still and
